“ One of my earliest memories was him and his motorcycle. At the time he was a first responder at the fire house in Indian Wells. I was in elementary at the time. I remember all of us riding his bike to the bus stop early in the mornings. All cold and freezing, riding down the dirt road to catch the school bus. We all wave goodbye to him, and get on to find a seat. I sit on the driver side, by the cold window. I can see my breath fogging up the window. I always sat next to the stop sign on the bus, I was always intrigued by it. We start leaving and start thinking about school and breakfast. A few moments pass down the road. I'm just looking out the window. I see him pass us as he's on his way to work. "That's my dad!" I say. He was wearing his work jacket at the time. Dark blue jacket with the First Responder patch on his shoulder. I'll never forget that short moment. That glimpse of him passing us, and me realizing it was him. He had that motorcycle for a while, but later on had to scrap it. I was fortunate enough to find one online and close by. I had to buy it, and it's exactly like I remember it. Sure it's not the exact one he had, but it's the same kind he had. I'm going to get my license and all the fixtures for it. I'll be riding it in remembrance of him, my father.
